"Bu Industry me Thrive."

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1892.

THE CITY OF FREE TRADE.

A pilgrim strolled at the early dawn Where a river flowed by the sea, To watch the ships when the tide came in And to see what their freight might be;

A noble ship that had braved the storms Was anchored outside the bar, While an unknown flag streamed from her

Untouched by the trace of a star.

Near by the bluff was the ruin old Where a bustling city had stood, Where wealth was mined from under her

And was wrought from the wayside wood. But the anvil was gone from the block, And the wheel of the mill was still-The tenement rows were tenantless In the city under the hill.

There were signs of better days gone by A church with a toppling tower. That stood a sentinel of the dead In the gleam of that morning hour; And the blackened timbers of years agone Were casting their shadows of gloom-

The pall of death-on forsaken streets That we hushed as the voiceless tomb. And the fields untilled on the hillside stood With their waste of briar and thorn, That once were the fields of nodding plumes

With their bountiful wealth of corn: The roadway to the city was lost, And the fall of the foot unheard; The only sound on the misty air

Was the pines that the sea breeze stirred The tide came in, and the ship rode in, Well freighted from over the sea With the wares that pauper labor wrough In a land where the ports are free; Her hold was filled with iron and steel,

To an inland city consigned That stood in the shade of the towering hills That were teeming with wealth unmined.

The pilgrim asked of the mate on board, As she passed by a ruined mill, What plague has smitten the people here In this city under the bill?"

And the mate replied, with haughty pride, To the question the pilgrim made, That the plague that laid the city low Was the pestilence of Free Trade. -Pittsburg Times.
